Last week, Maria started a new job as a sales assistant at Bright Tech Company. On her first day, she arrived at the office at 9:00 a.m. and met her manager, Daniel, and people from the HR department. They showed her the building, explained company rules, and gave her information about her responsibilities. Before lunch, Maria checked her emails, organized customer files, and attended a short team meeting.

The next day, the IT department installed new software on her computer and helped her create passwords for different systems. Maria spent most of the morning contacting clients and answering questions about the company's products. In the afternoon, she worked with two colleagues to prepare materials for a marketing campaign that the company planned to launch the following month.

During the rest of the week, Maria attended several meetings with different departments, including marketing and customer service. She learned how the company dealt with customer problems and how employees developed relationships with important clients. Although she felt nervous at first, Maria completed all her tasks on time and quickly became part of the team.

On Friday afternoon, the manager organized a meeting for new employees. Daniel thanked Maria for her hard work and said she learned very quickly. After work, some employees went to a café near the office, but Maria didn't go because she wanted to visit her family.
